
Your transformation partner should still be in the room

when it gets hard.

Most transformation programs don't fail at the strategy phase. They fail at the implementation one.

C A T A B O N A V I A

Service designer · transformation partner

shiftwithpurpose.com.au

S W I P E →

The exciting part of transformation is easy to staff.

Vision workshops, co-design sessions, strategy decks that leave everyone energised;
there is no shortage of people who will show up while the future still feels possible.

S W I P E →

Transformation rarely fails at the strategy phase.

It fails in the distance between the whiteboard and Tuesday morning; the messy, unglamorous, deeply human work of making something actually land inside a real organisation.

I close that distance by staying inside it.

Not handing over a document and wishing you well. Not disappearing once the kickoff energy fades. Six months in, when the pilot isn't behaving the way the plan said it would, I am still in the room asking what is actually getting in the way.

Staying means knowing your people, not just your org chart.

When the pressure to ship anything, anything at all, begins to override the reason you started, someone has to hold the experience picture. That someone has spent enough time alongside your team to read what they are actually telling you.

SWIPE →

Staying means seeing options where the room sees walls.

Curiosity does not switch off when implementation gets hard; it switches on. Where others see blocks, I see the next move, because design thinking is a posture, not a workshop.

SWIPE →

Staying means making the strategy actually run.

Systems, process and change are how I think. So the plan we build together does not live in a deck; it lives in workflows, in conversations, in the way your team gets through Tuesday.

SWIPE →

Real returns come from staying, not from strategy decks.

The organisations getting compound results from transformation aren't the ones with the prettiest plans. They're the ones who had a partner in the room for the hard part.

Planning a transformation and want a partner who stays for all of it?

shiftwithpurpose.com.au →